WHAT’S IN A NAME?

I gave birth to Calvin Michael Howe on Nov. 15, 1997. In the process of choosing our son’s name, my husband and I learned, as all new parents do, the weight of such a decision. After all, a name defines who you are. It forms your identity forever.

“Hey Mark, Hey Geoff, Hey Scott, Hey Steve!” We’d speak these names out loud, trying to determine which one “fit” our son’s personality before he was even born.

It’s not just the sound of a name that is important, of course. It’s an opportunity to honor someone you respect. While there are several people in our world whom we admire, we named him after my father in hopes that Cal will seek his guidance and follow his example of love, good humor and kindness.

New buildings also give people an opportunity to honor someone special. These names give definition to the buildings and their mission. When Stonehill broke ground for a new library in May 1997, we had an opportunity to name the structure after someone whose presence has permeated all corners of the campus. President Fr. Bartley MacPhaidín, C.S.C., a man of extraordinary character, seemed the natural choice.

A scholar and a visionary, Fr. MacPhaidín embodies all that we hope the new library will provide for our community. We hope our students will seek wisdom in this new structure, learning not only from its books and state of the art technology, but also from the example set by its namesake.

The library was born through Stonehill’s historic Capital Campaign, which concluded after successfully surpassing its $20 million goal by $3 million last December. A good portion of the funds raised - over $12 million - were designated for the library, which today stands near completion. It is a beautiful reminder of the wonderful generosity of our supporters.

This summer the Fr. MacPhaidín, C.S.C. Library will open its doors to the Stonehill community and our neighbors. Forever, it will carry the name of one of Stonehill’s legends. If, like Calvin, the Fr. MacPhaidín Library lives up to its namesake, it will be truly outstanding.

Fr. MacPhaidín’s immeasurable contributions to Stonehill in his 20 years as president and the many years before that as student and faculty member are chronicled in our profile of him beginning on page 6.

U.S. News & World Report Ranks Stonehill #2 Among Regional Liberal Arts Colleges in the North

Stonehill was again listed among U.S. News & World Report's top regional liberal arts colleges in the North. Placing second behind Susquehanna University in Penn., the College retained its position in the number two spot from last year's survey. U.S. News also ranked Stonehill fourth in "operating efficiency," a new table that uses net cost and efficiency to evaluate schools and to help students and their families "get their money's worth."

"Stonehill's inclusion, yet again, in U.S. News & World Report's annual list of best colleges is an honor. This recognition reflects positively on our student body, the dedication of Stonehill's faculty, the quality of our resources and facilities and on how well the College is run," said Director of Communications Martin McGovern.

U.S. News ranked over 1,400 colleges and universities based on academic reputation, student retention, faculty resources, student selectivity, financial resources and alumni giving rates. Among the individual criteria used by U.S. News, Stonehill ranked first in student retention and third in student selectivity.

Money Magazine Lists Stonehill Among Top 100 Best College Values in the Nation

Stonehill College was again listed among Money magazine's top 100 best college buys in the nation. Ranking 95th in the 1998 value rankings, the College jumped up three spots from last year, when it placed 98th in the country.

Money magazine ranked over 1,100 colleges based on an analysis of cost and academic quality. Other Massachusetts colleges in the "elite" top 100 include: Harvard University (43rd), the University of Massachusetts-Amherst (46th) and the Massachusetts Institute of Technology (68th). In the Northeast, Stonehill ranked 16th, jumping up from the 19th slot last year.
Sharon Robinson, daughter of baseball great Jackie Robinson, was the keynote speaker for “Fear No People Week” on Nov. 4 at the Joseph W. Martin Jr. Institute for Law and Society.

Pam Kelly ’98 Student-Athlete

Turn to Webster’s III International Dictionary and look up student-athlete. Somewhere in that definition the name Pam Kelly ’98 surfaces, a perfect combination of academics and athletics.

Kelly, a three-year women’s volleyball captain, engineered her team to its most successful four-year record ever, with 87 wins and 43 losses. This feat is accentuated even more by her individual legend which includes every known record of significance in Stonehill volleyball lore.

In addition to the 87 victories, Kelly played in 126 matches, 428 games, was credited with 3,329 assists and 1,273 digs. Over her career she averaged over a 95 percent serving percentage and capped her senior year with a 98 percent standard, all Stonehill records.

Twelve times during her volleyball career, Kelly was named to all-tournament teams. She highlighted her career by being named to the GTE CoSIDA All-Academic volleyball team as a senior. As a junior, she was on the second team.

Kelly also captains the Lady Chieftains basketball team. With the season over, Kelly and her fellow seniors have been a part of 104 victories, three NE-10 championships, and four NCAA bids including a trip to the NCAA Final Four in 1995.

Academically Kelly maintains a 3.68 grade point average as a chemistry major in the honors program. Her All-American numbers in the classroom and on both the volleyball and basketball courts reflect Pam Kelly the person, admired by everyone.

Thoughts on Campus Diversity
by Alex Gallagher ’98
(excerpt from speech delivered at Academic Convocation, Fall 1997)

“Fr. Dan Issing, C.S.C. recently gave an address in which he discussed a trip to Africa. The speech focused on the reverence the African people showed toward each other as well as strangers. It is this reverence that I would like to speak of today.

Three years ago I entered Stonehill with the clear goal of receiving a diploma on May 17, 1998. I was not overly concerned with what I would do to get that piece of paper, but I wanted it to be quick and painless. Today as a senior, I can safely say that I have received an education which, when I began, was beyond the realm of my imagination.

I have had outstanding classroom experiences, but it is something even more than the literature that we have all dissected or the problems that we have all solved. It is beyond the oral reports, and the 15-page term papers. It has been a magical time for me because of the people I have come into contact with throughout my years here.

On my first day at Stonehill three years ago I was greeted by an orientation leader who jokingly said, “Welcome to ‘Clonehill.’” He pointed out to me that everybody was pretty much the same on the campus, and that I should feel very comfortable at Stonehill because I fit right into the mold. Fortunately for me I had the foresight to take offense to that comment. This person did not know me, yet had decided I was the same as everyone else. That supposed leader had no interest in getting to know who I was. They were not accepting the full academic challenge, which I am here to set forth to you today.

Our campus is diverse. Aside from the growing population of minority and international students on campus, we also have over 1,800 students, plus hundreds of faculty and administrative staff, who have had life experiences unique to each and every one of us. We have all faced triumph and defeat, joy and tragedy, laughter and sorrow. We are all drastically different individuals, and we all must recognize that we are to live within a community that values the whole person.

I said that I was here today to set forth the ultimate in academic challenges, and while there are some who may argue against my opinion, this is it: our greatest accomplishment as a college community should be to create an environment in which we educate each other. From freshman to senior to faculty to administration, we must heed the call for a better and more vibrant learning atmosphere. We cannot allow ourselves to accept that people are the same. We must always strive to find what is great about every human being that steps foot on this campus. By doing that we not only continue to help in the creation of great people, but we better ourselves for simply knowing them.

It is the connection of my classroom endeavors along with the relationships I have formed with an amazingly diverse group of people that have made the beginning of my senior year bittersweet. I am well prepared to face the rest of my life, and yet at the same time I do not want to go. I have been lucky enough to realize that the greatest resource that we all have is each other. I walk this campus everyday and think of how fortunate I am to live in a community with such an awesome group of people.

It is at this point that I would ask you to recall the address I spoke of just a few minutes ago: Fr. Dan’s speech on reverence. He told a story of being made to feel that he was the most important man in the world. This stranger in Africa made him feel that his life was so special it had to be celebrated.

Imagine if we were to do that? Imagine if we celebrated every life that we come into contact with as if it were the most wonderful in the world? What kind of a place would this be? The call must go out to every member of this community to push one another to create that feeling. If we as a group are to have a legacy, I can only dream that this could be it. And so on behalf of the student body, I welcome the new members of our community, and I wish us all luck as we begin this fantastic undertaking.”
Stonehill Stirs in Summer

During the summer, the Stonehill campus is alive with activity. Increasingly, the College plays host to a variety of cultural and community events. The annual Irish Festival may be the best-known summer happening, but it is just one of many diverse activities held at the College. Here are some of the highlights for Summer 1998:

- On Saturday, May 30, the Community Bank of Brockton will sponsor its second annual Kite Festival. For information, call Susan Tenenbaum at (508) 587-3210.

- On June 12, 13 and 14, the Irish Cultural Centre of Boston will hold its annual Irish Festival. For information, call the ICC at (617) 323-3399.

- July sees the return of College Academy, an academic summer camp for middle grade students. For information, call Steve Kilpatrick at (781) 784-1554.

- On Saturday, Aug. 1, Stonehill will host the 15th Tam O' Shanter Scottish Highland Games. For information, call Tom Welsh at (508) 581-7116.

- On Sunday, Aug. 2, the Boston Jazz Society, which this year celebrates 25 years of presenting jazz, will hold its annual Jazz Festival and Barbecue. For information, call Ed Henderson at (617) 445-2811.

In addition to these public events, the College hosts basketball camps, orientation sessions, retreats, conferences and leadership institutes during the summer. Of particular note this year, Stonehill will welcome a special Ames Family reunion in June. The College stands on the grounds of the former Ames estate. The family's first reunion was held at the College in 1988.

In February, the Brockton Coalition for the Homeless and MainSpring House presented the Stonehill Buildings and Grounds Department with their 1998 Award of Appreciation because so many B&G members have used their labor and skills to help local homeless people. In the accompanying picture, three representatives of MainSpring House, Executive Director Dennis Carman '82 (seated left), Director of Individual Programs Fr. James M. Duane, C.S.C. Athletic Hall of Fame to Induct Three Members in May

Former basketball star Beth Aries Daly '78, men's basketball and baseball standout Paul Hayes '70 and Stonehill Sports Information Director Bob Richards will be inducted into the Stonehill Athletic Hall of Fame during the 10th annual ceremony on May 2 in Alumni Hall.

Daly ended her basketball career at Stonehill with 999 points, but would have easily made over 1,000 if a game with AIC wasn't canceled because of the Blizzard of '78.

"My mother always talks about the game we didn't make up because of the Blizzard 20 years ago," recalls Daly, who is employed by GTE in Needham and resides in Medfield.

Hayes, who lives in Cumberland, R.I., played basketball for three coaches while also having good years as a first baseman and pitcher on the baseball team. After graduation, Paul went into coaching as an assistant in both sports at U-Mass Dartmouth in 1972. From 1974-84, Hayes coached at the varsity level in Mansfield. He is now employed as a mortgage expert.

After 21 years as Stonehill's Sports Information Director, Bob Richards will retire at the end of this academic year.

During his tenure, Richards witnessed profound changes in Stonehill athletics: the number of varsity teams has grown from six to 17 (soon to be 18); Stonehill became a charter member of the Northeast-10; and the College has won countless championships.

Since 1984, Richards has taught journalism in the Department of Communication and also serves as advisor to both The Summit, Stonehill's student newspaper, and Acres, the yearbook. Richards also has worked at The Enterprise for 37 years.

a builder of dreams...

By Sandra Howe

This February, Fr. Bartley MacPhaidín, C.S.C. ’59 celebrated his 20th Anniversary as Stonehill’s President. His presidency is by far the longest and most significant era in the College’s young history.

Under his leadership, Stonehill has become one of the region’s leading institutions of higher learning. Of course, one individual could not effect such a transformation alone. Fr. MacPhaidín, however, brought a vision, a commitment and the capacity to change Stonehill for the better with his administrative aptitude, charismatic personality, and passion for the College.
Destiny

He always expected he would someday serve at the helm of Stonehill, his alma mater and place of employment since 1966. He taught philosophy and theology for eight years as he worked towards his doctoral degree. The late 1960s and early 1970s, however, were years of great upheaval on college campuses. A popular professor, Fr. MacPhaidin got caught up in the excitement of the times, founding the Institute for Justice and Peace and contributing regular columns to The Summit. As a result, he let his dissertation dangle.

His active participation in the issues of the period eventually came to haunt him, however. In 1975, when his colleagues urged Fr. MacPhaidin to apply for the academic dean's position, he was rejected. He didn't even make the "short list," Fr. MacPhaidin recalls, because he did not have a terminal degree.

After that professional disappointment, he took a sabbatical and returned to the Pontifical Gregorian University in Rome, where he completed his doctoral dissertation. He had not yet defended his thesis on phenomenology and faith when the Stonehill presidency became vacant. His Provincial, nevertheless, encouraged him to apply.

"I always knew I'd be president someday, but I didn't think the opportunity would present itself so soon," he recalls. His candidacy was successful and he returned to campus to begin his new career after the Blizzard of '78.

From the start, Fr. MacPhaidin resolved to remain true to the College's religious heritage while striving for academic excellence in all fields. At first, the presidential responsibility was a bit overwhelming.

"I was not prepared and would have benefited from a mentor to help me learn the languages of high finance and educational public policy," he recalls. As a result, Fr. MacPhaidin played "catch-up" for the first few years. In the early years of his presidency he had two main goals: to strengthen the academic quality of the institution and to make Stonehill more widely known. He did so through small "ad-hoc" campaigns geared towards specific projects or needs, such as a computer center or field house. He also joined numerous boards and committees in the higher education community both on the state and national levels, making a name for himself and the College. As time has proven, Fr. MacPhaidin's strategy worked.

Changes

With over 20 buildings added to the physical plant, 14 programs added to the curriculum, and 12 teams added to athletics - not to mention the exciting dining and housing options that were unimaginable 20 years ago - the Stonehill of today has grown almost beyond recognition under Fr. MacPhaidin's leadership.

For example, take the area of student recruitment. Today's students come to Stonehill from across America and around the world. Most rank in the top 19 percent of their high school class Stonehill's tour guides today have an easier job promoting the College to prospective students than their counterparts did 20 years ago. That difference is in large measure because of the Herculean efforts of Fr. Bartley MacPhaidin, C.S.C. over the last 20 years. During his tenure as president, the physical landscape of the College has been astoundingly altered. The Martin Institute, the Commons, the Computer Center, and the new Library are lasting monuments to his years in office. Former gymnasiums, the Educational Building, the Science Building and countless dormitories have been changed beyond recognition for the better. But not only has Bartley stretched out the little map of the College, he also has put it on the larger map in terms of its reputation around the world. In my own travels to conferences, I've often heard Stonehill referred to as the College with that charming Irishman at the helm.

Surely, it is Bartley's charm that has managed to wring the last dollar out of would-be contributors. And like Twain's Emilene Grangerford, Bartley is always ready to take off with literally back-breaking speed to deliver a tribute which, as even he jokingly admits, might turn out to be soothing not only for the immediate circumstances of its occasion but also for the College's long range future. Behind the charm is an intelligence that makes him such a wonderful raconteur. The force of his personality has brought such varied honorees to our graduations as Corazon Aquino, Bianca Jagger, Mary Martin, and Noel Pearson, as the sheer energy of his rhetoric makes converts of the earlier unconvinced in campus debates.

At times, Bartley and I have disagreed, particularly over what I felt was his preference for buildings over programs, or about his thinking that there is an uncrossable gulf between scholarship and teaching.

Yet the fact that the College has opened itself up to the disagreements essential to real change is a measure of the difference Bartley has made. And, though the faculty has on occasion lost battles which at the time seemed more central than they actually were, the extent to which those of us on the losing side still have been regarded as the loyal opposition is a measure of the spirit pervasive in every corridor of the College, a spirit grounded in a real love for our work here.

Finally, the real difference of Bartley's presidency is not one of the obvious influence of charm and intelligence but of the ways the College is supportive in times when it senses that individual community members are in trouble. I have heard countless stories about how Bartley has sensed when his priestly calling could work to help, when he has used his office to suggest that, in Simone Weil's words: "The Love of our neighbor in all its fullness simply means being able to say to him: 'What are you going through?'" Sometimes in a very compassionate person, it means not even asking, just knowing how charm works the magic of healing.
When Bartley MacPhaidin became president 20 years ago, Stonehill was already a wonderful college with good students, dedicated faculty, a beautiful campus, and a mission that had been fostered for 30 years by Holy Cross Religious and lay men and women of many traditions. What Bartley brought, however, was a rare combination of perseverance, creativity, and vision. Stonehill was a good college; he wanted it to be a great college. The campus was pleasant; he wanted it to be beautiful. Nobody was surprised when he sent students to Dublin, but it wasn’t long after that he was sending them to Yaroslavl as well.

Twenty years have passed, and Stonehill’s student body is not only bigger, it is brighter and more talented. The faculty are not only teachers, but scholars. Not only does Stonehill reach out to the community; the community far beyond the South Shore comes to Stonehill.

Nobody suggests, of course, that Bartley did this alone. But it was his perseverance that found friends and resources. It was his creativity that facilitated the work and commitment of faculty and staff, of alumni and friends. It was his vision that has shaped the Stonehill College that we know today.

It has been a great 20 years. May there be many more!

Fr. James Lackenmier, C.S.C. ’61
President, King’s College
Wilkes-Barre, Penn.

Danish philosopher, Søren Kierkegaard stressed the importance of the “critical moment,” a point in time when one’s destiny could be forever enhanced through the introduction of faith to illuminate knowledge. If institutions have the capacity for such an experience, Stonehill’s “critical moment” occurred with the arrival of Fr. Bartley MacPhaidin as its President. MacPhaidin, himself an avid Kierkegaard scholar, could not have been unaware of the potential to move Stonehill to the next level and indeed, the necessity to do so.

Under MacPhaidin, Stonehill met all its significant challenges in the 80s and 90s. Bartley’s energy enabled him to succeed beyond his own expectations. For example, he exhibited great sensitivity to the College’s over-dependence on tuition revenues. To this end, he has attracted a record number of benefactors, ultimately building a $68 million Endowment and a $20 million Capital Campaign, another huge first for Stonehill.

Bartley has put his personal stamp on Stonehill’s destiny. As an alumnus and a trustee, I take pride in his many accomplishments. Good fortune surely befell the College in the joining of the critical moments in 1978.

with a mean combined SAT score of about 1120. In 1978, only 19 states were represented, with only two international students on campus. Still, the College was strong and Fr. MacPhaidin assembled a talented faculty and administration to develop the unlimited potential of the young school.

The national media soon took note of that realized potential. In 1985, US News and World Report ranked Stonehill among the best colleges in the North for the first time. Since then, the College has been regularly featured in the annual college rankings issue, retaining the number two spot in the Northeast for the past two years. It also has been listed in Money magazine’s top 100 best buys in the country, underscoring the careful handling of College finances through the years. Indeed, under his leadership, the College’s endowment has grown from $2.55 million in June 1978 to $68,575,274 in December 1997, ranking 22nd among all (reporting) Catholic colleges and universities in the United States.

Fr. MacPhaidin readily shares credit for the College’s success. “I rely on the support of both administrators and faculty. At all levels, they consistently do their best to further our mission,” he said.

Sacrifices

Leading Stonehill to such heights has not been without cost. Fr. MacPhaidin reflects that once he became president, his life and time were no longer his own, especially during the last five years as he focused on the Capital Campaign. He regrets having had less time to spend on campus, less time with the Congregation of Holy Cross - his religious community - and less time for interaction with faculty, students and staff.

“I’ve had to neglect much of my personal life in order to attend to the needs of the College and have thus forsaken any kind of stable home life,” he said.

Fr. MacPhaidin wouldn’t change his career choice, however. Although he once dreamed of a career on the stage (and actually won several awards as a teenager in Ireland for his theatrical performances) or a career in medicine, he says being a college president is rewarding.

“Looking back, it has been a most interesting and unusual experience because no two days are ever alike,” reflected Fr. MacPhaidin. “The variety of constituencies with whom one interacts is virtually inexhaustible and I thrive on that kind of dynamic.

“I feel that I’ve lived several careers, not only as a college president, but as a teacher, a public speaker and a priest who ministers to and counsels those in need.” Indeed, Fr. MacPhaidin preaches at funerals, celebrates weddings and baptizes children regularly.

“Most people see my life tied to the College,” he said. “And it is to a great extent, but I also get involved in pastoral ministry, which is rewarding because I get a chance to experience all shades of the life spectrum.”

Aspirations

In strengthening the College’s educational and social mission, Fr. MacPhaidin launched the College’s first Capital Campaign in 1992. According to Fr. MacPhaidin, the decision to embark on such a major project confronted him as an individual.

“I knew if I didn’t complete a campaign before I retired, it wouldn’t have happened for many years. So, I felt I owed it to the College to set forth on this mission,” he said. “It was a very onerous undertaking, requiring us to harness all efforts of the institution, and we exceeded our goals, thanks to the commit
Funds were raised for three objectives: student scholarships; faculty development, academic resources, Martin Institute outreach; and the new library, which was recently named in honor of Fr. MacPhaidin. [For more on the results of the Campaign and the new library, see Briefing].

It was not his desire to have the new library named in his honor. Fr. MacPhaidín points out with authority, “In fact, I resisted it for a year,” he noted. “But now that it is done, it is a gesture that humbles me.

“As [Thomas] Aquinas said, ‘honor est in honorante’ meaning the virtue of honor rests in the person who is honoring, not in the one who's being honored,” he added. “So if there’s any greatness to being recognized in this way, it’s in those doing the honoring, not in me.” He believes strongly in the importance of the new facility, however, and hopes it will serve as the focal point for academic life on campus for years to come.

Reflecting on one of the proudest moments of his career — watching [former] President Ronald Reagan sign a $6 million grant in the White House for the Joseph W. Martin Jr. Institute for Law and Society — Fr. MacPhaidin says it was an awesome triumph for the College.

“It was such a thrill to have a bill introduced in the U.S. Congress that was solely for Stonehill,” he said. “The building that resulted - the Martin Institute - has changed the campus culture dramatically by serving as the leading regional center for education, research and public service.”

Legacy

While Fr. MacPhaidin emphasizes that his work is not yet done, his fingerprints are evident in every corner of the campus, from improved academics, student life, sports, facilities and the strong sense of community. In addition, his concern for people from all walks of life inspires a sense of compassion in each and every member of the campus community.

“I hope I’ve made our students aware of the social teachings of the Catholic Church with regard to society’s current problems,” he noted. The College affords students many volunteer service opportunities, including four organized volunteer trips over spring break to Peru, Appalachia, the Bronx and Roxbury. In addition, many volunteer programs are active throughout the year.

In February 1998, Fr. Bartley MacPhaidin, C.S.C. celebrated his 20th year as president of Stonehill. What can you say about a person who is an institutional icon? A lot!

I was fortunate to meet Fr. MacPhaidin when I was interviewed for the position of Director of Intercultural Affairs in 1992. I was struck then, as I am now, by his level of commitment to and his earnest desire for the creation of a pluralistic society. It was his leadership and direction that forged two commission reports in 1992: the Presidential Commission on Pluralism and the Presidential Commission on Campus Culture.

The impetus for the creation of the Office of Intercultural Affairs, as well as the establishment of the Intercultural Affairs Committee (IAC) came out of the Pluralism Report. These entities serve to assess and make recommendations on actualizing the College’s goal to increase the number of American students of color to eight percent by the year 2000. The report qualified this recruitment goal by stating that there is no necessary conflict between quality education and increasing access to that education by diverse student populations.

To this end, the report called for the College to examine other areas like curriculum; diversity of faculty, staff and Board of Trustees members; and community service and programming opportunities. Recommendations in the Campus Culture Report called for examination of our governance structure. The 1993 Commission on Governance was created to address concerns identified in a campus-wide audit earlier that year. These reports continue to be active in the life of the College today.

Fr. MacPhaidin epitomizes the new and improved Stonehill. He symbolizes the “greatness” that drives our community forward. He is the true change agent. Through effective role modeling the community is accepting differences. In essence, we have become, as he is, a risk-taker in this journey for change in the 21st century.

Fr. MacPhaidin, congratulations, you have done a marvelous job! May you have many more years to test your theories. God bless.

"The more things change, the more they stay the same," is a phrase that characterizes Fr. Bartley MacPhaidín’s two decades of presidential leadership at Stonehill. While moving the College forward with a fearless vision for the future, Fr. MacPhaidín also looked back to the school that generations of graduates fondly remember.

As a distinguished graduate, he understands that the ultimate definition of Stonehill was and still is a supportive community of learners committed to the belief that everyone is capable and responsible for knowing and creating. Indeed, when I remember the College as it was long ago, it is usually as a dedicated and caring circle of intellectual and spiritual faculty who helped students break from their smaller worlds, and act on their dreams.

This transformational tradition of excellence in teaching continues at Stonehill. Under Fr. MacPhaidín’s leadership, a superb faculty of diverse, distinguished scholars and outstanding teachers has been assembled to provide Stonehill students with an enormous reservoir of knowledge, experience and imagination to draw upon and admire. He also created for students and faculty a plentiful environment in which education can happen. Clearly, Fr. MacPhaidín knows that the most lasting legacy of the College is the faculty’s gift for uplifting the minds and hearts of its students.

Another example of the overriding themes of continuity and change throughout Fr. MacPhaidín’s tenure are the tremendous strides taken by him to further the College’s historic commitment to serving the educational and public service needs of the region. In the early years of the College, students were encouraged to engage in community service. Today, the College still reaches the larger community and invites members to participate in the educational, political, religious, economic and cultural life of the region. The Joseph W. Martin Jr. Institute for Law and Society, which was constructed and dedicated during Fr. MacPhaidín’s presidency, seeks to contribute to the quality of public policy and public service in the region. In addition, the Institute encourages young people to pursue careers in public service.

And so, in my opinion, what makes Fr. MacPhaidín’s presidency remarkable is his ability to connect where we have been, with where we are, and to where we are going. He symbolizes a constant yet creative center in the history of the College. By preserving and expanding the best of the College’s spirit, he has projected Stonehill’s reputation to be among the top small liberal arts colleges in the country. Fr. Bartley MacPhaidín is surely one of the most accomplished, respected and much loved presidents of Stonehill.

The number of children growing up in poverty has increased, and we as educators have a responsibility to assist them, otherwise many aren’t going to have a chance in our society," he said.

Diversifying the campus community is another top priority for Fr. MacPhaidín. With his goal of enrolling at least eight percent U.S. students of color by the year 2000 seemingly within reach, he looks forward with optimism to an even more vibrant and diverse Stonehill in the next century. "We’ve been making good progress on this front and I want to keep the momentum going," he comments.

In reflecting on Fr. MacPhaidín’s presidency, Assistant Professor of History Fr. Richard Gribble, C.S.C., author of Fulfilling a Dream: Stonehill College 1948 to 1998, argues: "The College’s success has been created through maintenance of a vision that has guided decision makers throughout the years. Fr. MacPhaidín has held the vision in full view during his long tenure as president. He understands the contribution of those who have gone before him and the need for today’s College to provide a model for future growth and development."

So, after 20 years at the helm, Fr. MacPhaidín - the first Stonehill graduate to hold the position - continues to strive for excellence in all areas of College life. We look forward to the coming years under his continued leadership and will always consider his presidency as a pivotal era that propelled Stonehill College to new horizons.

Up-close with Fr. Bartley MacPhaidín, C.S.C.

Alums who have kids enrolled at Stonehill find that some things change and some, luckily, stay the same.

By Bruce Morgan

The changes at Stonehill have come so fast and thick over the past few decades that it's hard to know just where to start the tale. Let's begin with a handful of students perambulating in the open air, more than 35 years ago. Fred Hopkinson '63 remembers a time before any residence halls had been built at Stonehill, when 75 percent of the students were commuters, and those students who weren't commuters lived in houses near campus. Hopkinson was commuting from Dorchester then. "It was nothing to see 10 or 12 people walking along Route 138 to get to class," he says, "and we'd stop and pick them up."

The campus consisted of four buildings (Donahue Hall, Holy Cross Center, the Merkert-Tracy Science Building, and the Old Cafeteria, then used as a student union), and the classes were small and informal ("If you brought coffee into a class, the professor was apt to say, 'Why don't you go get coffee for everyone?'" Hopkinson recalls). A highlight of the social calendar was a Wednesday afternoon bowling league where as many as 40 or 50 teachers, students and priests would car-pool to the Westgate Mall to pay a $5 admission and help raise money for the class. "It was a fun, get-together time," says Hopkinson, who admits that in some ways he can barely recognize the sprawling, buzzing Stonehill his son currently attends.

For one thing, Paul Hopkinson '00 lives on campus, sharing a six-room suite in Flynn Hall with 13 of his friends. Paul's experience reflects the larger shift at the College in recent decades, away from a commuter-based student body and toward a primarily residential population. "You get to meet more people, and strengthen your friendships, living on campus," Paul points out. "You get the full college experience."
Stonehill's growth has been phenomenal by any measure. The College has built 20 buildings over the past 20 years, while renovating existing structures at an aggressive rate. According to Associate Dean of Students and Director of Residence Life John King, the College has added 670 beds since 1981. Eighty percent of students now live on campus, with the consequence that student life at Stonehill has evolved into something more coherent and yeasty than ever before. “The majority of our students want to live on campus, because the type of community they find here is very appealing,” says King. “People want to be part of that.”

Changes on campus have far transcended bricks and mortar. Vice President and Dean of Student Affairs Lou Saltrelli describes Stonehill as “a much more serious, purposeful place” than previously. As evidence, Saltrelli cites “Into the Streets,” a community program begun five years ago under the aegis of Campus Ministry that sends freshmen into Brockton neighborhoods for a day of service; and “Fear No People,” a week-long slate of speeches and workshops held each year to celebrate cultural diversity on campus.

That diversity is increasingly real, say campus observers. Just six years ago, Stonehill was singled out by the Chronicle of Higher Education as “the whitest college in Massachusetts,” with students of color comprising less than 2 percent of the school’s population. Now more than 10 percent of the College’s students are either students of color or international students, according to Saltrelli. The tick upward was anything but accidental. “This was absolutely an initiative on our part. There was a common perception that we needed to focus on becoming a more diverse institution, so that Stonehill would be more reflective of the world our students will be entering once they graduate,” says the dean.

Students are also likely to graduate in better physical shape than previously, if the surge in sports participation over the past decade is any marker. In addition to varsity sports, King cites the appearance at Stonehill of such club sports as volleyball, field hockey, rugby, lacrosse and rowing. Intramurals have kept pace as well. “These are things that were never here before. For a small college, we have a great variety of sports going on,” added King.

Paul Hopkinson knows this for a fact. He recently joined about 20 other students as a member of the Mountain Biking Club, which got organized last fall. In addition to the general club, Stonehill also fields a mountain bike racing team, complete with a coach and out-of-state meets, Paul relates. Imagine, if you will, Paul and Fred Hopkinson passing each other at the entrance to campus, with one young man headed for the lanes at Westgate Mall and the other bound for a stretch of Vermont mountainside eager to leave his competitors in the dirt, and you have a picture of two generations at Stonehill finding their separate rewards.

Sampling the World

When he stays on campus, says Paul, there’s always plenty to do. He often gravitates to the Dining Commons, whether to eat meals, check his mail, connect with friends, or, in the evening, to listen to music. Every other weekend on Friday night, the student government runs a coffeehouse downstairs called the “Common Ground Café.” Students provide acoustic music, and coffee and cookies are served. It’s a popular place to hang out. “Like last weekend, there were 300 people there,” says Paul.

The addition of the Commons to campus in 1992 was a master stroke for school coherence and unity, say those who have been watching Stonehill for a while. Both Saltrelli and Executive Vice President Fr. Robert Kruse, C.S.C. ’55, quickly cite the Commons when asked to specify landmark developments in the emergent culture of the College.

“Before, there was not really a center to campus life,” Saltrelli explains. “The earlier College Center, despite its name, was more of an office building. In contrast, the Commons has rapidly become the hub of student life.” The presence of mailboxes, dining facilities, meeting rooms, game and lounge areas, plus a late-night snack bar keep the place hopping at all hours.

Fr. Kruse shares Saltrelli’s zest for the Commons. “It’s a marvelous situation there,” says Kruse. “Students love the building. With glass on all sides, you get a wonderful feeling for the change of the seasons from the interior. The building is very dramatic and welcoming. You can go into the Commons at just about any hour and find a quiet corner and carry on a very pleasant conversation with a group of people.”

Paradoxically, the more comfortable the campus has become, the faster the students want to leave it behind. Alums like Mary Beth (Barker) Cooney ’73 and Liz (Leroy) Contant ’70 remember a time when relatively few students had cars and, despite its proximity to Boston, the Easton campus felt much more isolated than it does today.

"There weren't any field trips into Boston in those days, and there wasn't any transportation provided by the College either," says Cooney, who had assumed she would be making frequent trips into the city when she first applied to Stonehill. "I saw it maybe four times in four years," she says now with a laugh.

Stonehill now runs a regular schedule of subsidized vans into Boston on the weekends, exposing between 400 and 500 students each semester to the riches of metropolitan culture. Students go to sample restaurants, art and science museums, concerts, theater shows, comedy clubs and more.

"This year, students have been to see the Picasso exhibit at the Boston Museum of Fine Arts, 'Blue Man Group,' and 'Stomp,'" says King. "We even run vans to New York City. And we've already made one trip up to L.L. Bean in Freeport, Maine this year. We do that one late at night, the way college students like to do it."

Departures from campus can be scheduled for more pragmatic reasons as well. Fr. Kruse points out that students are involved in a wide variety of internships at corporations, hospitals, museums, and schools — both in the Boston area and abroad. "They didn't exist on campus 20 years ago," he notes.

A second carton of milk

Something else that didn't exist a generation ago? The possibility of living in a dorm fully wired for computers.

Approximately half of all student residences are now connected to cyberspace; by the fall of 1999, the wiring job should be done, according to Fr. Kruse. The technological upgrade has come mostly over the last two years. "We were late in getting to it," concedes Saltrelli, "but all students who graduate now understand that this technology is part of their future."

To Liz Contant, technology meant packing a slide rule and dropping dimes into a telephone down the hall. Hand-held calculators had not yet arrived on the market. "Nowadays everyone has her own phone and answering machine. Back then, we had one pay phone for 40 girls. Yeah, right," she laughs.

The traditional way of doing things, it seemed, couldn't last long. For both Liz and Mary Beth Cooney, and husbands Phil Contant '70 and Jack Cooney '72, their four years at Stonehill coincided with an era of intense social upheaval on a national scale. "What stands out for me is the dramatic change we saw," says Phil. "The four years we were there may have been the most unusual period in history for anyone to be in college." As freshmen, Liz and Phil occupied a campus that had just one dormitory — O'Hara, reserved for men. Female students lived off-campus.

"A lot of weekend nights during my freshman year, we didn't have anything to do," Phil remembers. "The gym wasn't even open. There were no women on campus.

Stonehill required men to wear coats and ties, and curfews were strictly enforced. By their senior year, the jackets and ties had been tossed aside, and Stonehill had introduced coed townhouses and a campus bar. There were a lot more parties, and people to have parties with, says Phil.

Alterations on campus, both small and large, have rendered the place virtually unrecognizable to many graduates returning years later. Although he was active in campus affairs while a student (and helped build Brother Mike's over a semester break), Jack Cooney sometimes has trouble finding his way around campus when he returns to visit his daughter Cristin, a senior. "With all the physical growth, and the number of buildings that have been added, it's so different now," he says. "My last time there, I got rather disoriented. At one point I thought, 'Where am I now?'"

It's a common feeling. "When my friends and I return, we say, 'Hey, we got gypped, we want to go back,'" says Liz Contant, whose daughter Katy is currently a sophomore. Liz is referring to more than a bunch of new and renovated buildings. "Students now have choices," she explains. "There are so many more recreational facilities on campus now. And at mealtimes, they have salad bars, and all these wonderful choices for what they want to eat. For us, 'mystery meat' was a major commodity. Nobody knew what a salad bar was."

The big thrill at mealtime in their day, says the Contants, was trying to sneak a mystery meat down the hall. Hand-held calculators had not yet arrived on the market. "Nowadays everyone has her own phone and answering machine. Back then, we had one pay phone for 40 girls. Yeah, right," she laughs.

The big thrill at mealtime in their day, says the Contants, was trying to sneak a second carton of milk. Jack Cooney picks up the theme of expanded options as he ticks off a few of the changes he's seen through his daughter's experience. "Students are more mobile, they get to the city more, there's more variety for the girls in sports," he begins. "I think that culturally students now have more outlets because I see a lot of stuff posted on the bulletin board in Cristin's dorm when I go to visit, and Stonehill hasn't grown that much in..."
size." Adds Cooney, thoughtfully, "I think the College couldn’t stay as isolated as it was. It had to change and grow."

As parents, both Phil and Liz Contant detect a greater sensitivity on the College’s part to issues at the core of resident life. "There’s much more focus on what living in dorms is all about," says Liz, who served as Stonehill’s first director of housing back in 1973-74. She cites a recent campus program on "Alcohol Awareness," which her daughter Katy attended. Phil concurs, saying such programs at Stonehill reflect "a more sophisticated concern for the student" than existed in previous years. As evidence, he mentions a brochure he happened to pick up in Katy’s dorm earlier this fall. Distributed by Campus Ministry, the brochure offered tips for students on how to study effectively for exams and maintain balance in their lives during a time of increased pressure.

"It seems to me that the approach on campus these days is all about making things available to you as a student," Phil comments. "It’s not coercive in the way that an older, more traditional approach might have been. Kids are free to ignore the advice, but it helps set a tone—and speaking as a parent, there’s a high comfort level in that."

Few complaints

Inevitably, some things change; thankfully, some things stay the same. Katy Contant lives a life on campus in some ways not so very different from what her parents might have known. She enjoys the same small classes and friendly relations with her professors that they did. A combined political science/Spanish major who describes herself as "a very serious student," she hits the books hard. Katy rarely ventures into Boston. Instead, she prefers to stay on campus and relax by listening to music and poetry and playing cards with friends at the “Common Ground” coffeehouse.

On the other hand, Katy benefits from changes that have occurred at Stonehill in the decades since her parents walked these same paths hand in hand. She can pick among a variety of athletic options that simply didn’t exist then. In 1998, Stonehill fields varsity women’s teams in basketball, soccer, cross-country, track and softball, among others. Katy, a member of the cross-country team, trains daily and competes in 5K races every weekend. She has also played indoor soccer with an intramural team from her dorm. "That was low-key and fun," says Katy.

Cristin Cooney, who rides as a member of the Stonehill’s nationally-ranked equestrian team, has traced a similar route through college activities both classic and offbeat. Along with hundreds of her schoolmates, she attended a Halloween party last fall at the Ames Sports Complex. Cristin went with a bunch of her townhouse-mates dressed as dominoes and says she had a blast. Her parents might have done precisely the same thing in 1972.

Old mixed with new keeps Stonehill clicking and alive. Cristin’s mother raised the issue of durable campus culture when she volunteered that one of her daughter’s few complaints about college life had concerned the late-night rowdiness of certain boys in an adjacent dorm. Now what could be more timeless than that?

Interview with the Dean

By Martin McGovern

With the Capital Campaign successfully concluded, the College now focuses its attention more intensely toward academics. In the following interview, Academic Vice President and Dean Fr. Louis Manzo, C.S.C. '62 discusses Stonehill's intellectual life and the academic challenges that await the College in the years ahead. Fr. Manzo taught in Stonehill's Department of Religious Studies from 1974 until 1993 when he was appointed Acting Academic Dean. In 1994, he became Academic Vice President and Dean.

Fr. Manzo, a former Chair of the Department of Religious Studies, has taught courses in the Old and New Testaments, early and Renaissance church history and western religions. He holds a doctorate in sacred theology from Academia Alfonsiana in Rome and a S.T.B. from the University of Montreal. Since 1977, Fr. Manzo has pursued a dual career in academia and in the military. A chaplain with the Air National Guard, he now holds the rank of Lieutenant Colonel.

What does a Stonehill education offer today?

It offers the strength of our liberal arts tradition. A Stonehill education gives students the ability to speak, write and reflect with depth and clarity. We educate students to be good communicators. We train them not just in professional techniques, but also in how to look at life in a broader perspective. That is the purpose of history, literature, philosophy and religious studies; when students confront an issue, they see it in both historical and classic terms.

We teach students to appreciate that many basic human issues are enduring and that people confront them in every age. We give them context and meaning for the struggles they face. For example, one of our graduates, who works in an accounting division of a bank, recently told me that he is happy that he had to take literature, religious studies and philosophy at Stonehill. He feels that our vigorous program of academic studies has engaged him in a lifelong quest for intellectual excellence. He senses that he has gained a perspective that some of his colleagues missed in their education.

As Stonehill celebrates its 50th anniversary this year, what is your chief goal as Academic Vice President and Dean?

Now that the Capital Campaign is over, my goal is to ensure that teaching and learning at Stonehill keep pace with the many physical developments that we have accomplished. We must continue to provide faculty and students with the resources and the opportunities that stimulate scholarship and quality learning.

The new library, for example, offers great potential in this regard, and we must take full advantage of it. Stonehill is at a turning point, and the physical changes we see around us are symbolic of the higher academic levels that we can and must achieve. The beautiful campus we have built must become home to an evermore vigorous community of scholars and learners.

How will that be done?

We already have an accomplished faculty, but we continue to strive for excellence. Our faculty are both achieving more prominence in their fields and becoming ever better teachers. Moreover, we have a bright and energetic student body. This year, 28 percent of the freshman class were in the top 10 percent of their high school class and 69 percent were in the top 25 percent. Our student retention level is also impressive.

In setting higher standards, however, we have to be more effective in assessing student learning. Assessment is a central concern in education today, and accreditation agencies increasingly expect colleges and universities to verify attainment of their learning goals.

In the past, the accrediting agencies focused on resources. For example, how many volumes are in the library, how many faculty members have their doctorates, what is the student/faculty ratio, etc. Today, these same agencies are asking colleges and universities to demonstrate how much students actually learn and to show the outcome of the educational process. In essence, they want to know if we deliver on our promises. This means that we have to shift to evaluating outcomes. It also means that we must insist that students study and work harder, not because we value this activity in itself, but because, unsurprisingly, research has shown that the best predictor of learning is the amount of time students spend studying.

At present, we are working on our 10-year re-accreditation report for the New England Association of Schools and Colleges. The report is due in 1999, and much of the re-accreditation process is devoted to addressing the key issue of learning outcomes and assessment.
What kind of measures have you taken to ensure tougher academic standards?

We have tightened the standards for the Dean’s List. Students now have to earn a 3.5 grade point average, as opposed to a 3.2, to qualify for the Dean’s List. With that change, the Dean’s List has become a more competitive or selective honor. We have also increased the grade point average for honors at graduation.

We have also insisted on higher academic standards for internships. We offer more opportunities to study or do internships abroad. We now offer full semester credits for internships in Madrid, Paris, London, Dublin, Brussels and Montreal.

At the same time, we are offering more academic and intellectual challenges to students. I am thinking of the Stonehill Undergraduate Research Experience (SURE) that invites students to conduct primary research with their professors over the summer. Another is the Honors Program which, beginning in the freshman year, offers selected students unique curricular, co-curricular and advisement opportunities. We are also more purposefully exploiting the cultural resources of Boston and New York City.

You have known Stonehill as a student, a professor and now as a senior administrator. How has the College evolved?

Stonehill is more engaged in the broader intellectual or cultural world today than it was when I came here as a student in 1957 or even when I returned to teach in 1974. Today, in terms of the academic activities of students and the professional activities of faculty, we are more involved with the wider academic community at both a regional and a national level, and we have become more assertive about taking our place within that community.

In recent years, we have seen Stonehill students securing prestigious fellowships and grants, such as a Fulbright, a Goldwater and a Madison. These are all top-notch awards, and they prove that Stonehill students do compete with the best throughout the country. These awards also show that the faculty here is encouraging students and providing them with the knowledge and experience that they need for these kinds of opportunities. The same can be said for the success of the SURE program, which, I might add, has certainly helped our students with excellent job offers and good graduate school placements.

Our faculty are establishing an even more impressive publishing record. It is difficult today to receive tenure without some work in print. Our professors also aggressively and successfully compete for grants and fellowships. And Stonehill faculty members have appeared on the op-ed pages of some of the nation’s best newspapers.

As a teacher turned administrator, do you miss being in the classroom?

Of course, I miss the classroom. Administrative work brings many burdens, but the most difficult aspect of this job is the loss of direct contact with students in the classroom. There is a special joy in planning a course and presenting it to students. Nothing in administration quite matches that experience.

We hear a lot about the teaching/publishing divide in academia today; what are your thoughts on the subject?

I think it annoys many faculty to see reference to a conflict between teaching and publishing, and I am sure the two are not really in conflict. At the College, teaching is our primary mission; but, whether or not our faculty are publishing, they must be professionally active. That is a good thing, a positive development. The expectation at the Stonehill of today is that faculty will write and publish, and this relates to what I have said earlier about Stonehill taking its place on the broader regional and national academic stages.

We live in a technological world, how is that impacting the College?

In recent times, we have given much attention to technology. Stonehill has moved very quickly to enter the technological age, and we have invested a great deal of money and resources in staff and equipment. For example, last year we built two state of the art computer labs, facilities of which we are very proud. Next fall we will open a new computer-based language lab. And the new library will be fully equipped with current technology.

Of course, we have had to do this; otherwise, we would be offering an out-of-date education. The challenge, however, is to stay in line with the great advances in technology while assuring that they serve our educational mission. This is a difficult issue with many aspects. We have to find ways to pay for this technology. We have to assure that it is not just glitz but a tool in the learning process. We have to provide support for faculty who want to use these new tools effectively.

Can you share your thoughts on what makes Stonehill special?

We take a direct and personal concern in our students. Indeed, interaction with faculty and academic advisors is a vital part of a Stonehill education. With a student-faculty ratio of 1:13, our classes allow for individual attention. Our faculty are engaging and involved. Student-faculty interaction is more dynamic than ever before. In addition, we are increasingly better equipped to provide enriching experiences that extend beyond the classroom and, indeed, the campus. This, of course, refers back to the international options, the research opportunities, and such things as graduate school and career counseling.

I might add that, given my own experience in the Religious Studies Department, I think that we understand the religious tradition in a way that perhaps other colleges do not. Students here find that religion is as academically respectable as any other course. As one student put it to me recently, “I didn’t know that Christianity could be so intellectually interesting.” Another student said to me, “I am not even Christian, but some of my best courses were in Religious Studies because they have awakened my mind to religious issues in ways I did not think possible.”

What does the future hold for Dean Manzo and academics at Stonehill?

Lots of hard work and attention to detail. Lots of focus on continuing to raise academic standards. Securing re-accreditation will be a major focus as we deal with the ever-increasing demands and opportunities that technology offers. We have to examine our curriculum and take a clear look at our general studies program. Then, we will have to look at some of the areas where we should be stronger, such as the fine arts, and set about strengthening them.

Martin McGovern is Stonehill’s Director of Communications.
When Stonehill embarked on its first Capital Campaign in 1992, our goal was to raise $20 million for a new library, student scholarships, faculty development, academic resources, Martin Institute outreach and the Annual Fund.

Five years later, thanks to the unprecedented generosity of our constituents, we have surpassed that goal by over $3 million. As a result, as it prepares to enter the next century the College stands stronger than ever.

The Capital Campaign was not just about raising funds, however. It sought to reconnect our alumni with the campus community and strengthen our relationships with parents, friends of the College, foundations, neighbors and the Holy Cross community. Almost 10,000 donors and scores of volunteers participated, making this first Capital Campaign a resounding success.

"This was a very serious undertaking, and with the support of our benefactors, the Campaign exceeded all our expectations," said President Fr. Bartley MacPhaidin, C.S.C.

The Fr. Bartley MacPhaidin Library, recently named in honor of our president, stands as a monument to the Capital Campaign, a lasting reflection of the generosity of the Stonehill community and the foundations that believed in the College’s potential.

Over $12 million was raised for its construction, spurred by an $800,000 Kresge Foundation challenge grant, which inspired many to come forward with substantial gifts.

Scheduled to open in September, the Fr. MacPhaidin Library will enhance the classroom experience for our students and faculty by offering a larger body of print and technological resources. [For more on the Fr. MacPhaidin Library, see last page of Briefing.]

Furthermore, the College’s student scholarship recipients are living, breathing testimonials to the success of the Campaign. With over $6 million raised for student scholarships, Stonehill is now within the reach of many students who meet our admission standards but could not afford to attend without financial assistance.

Over $2 million was raised for faculty development, academic resources, and Martin Institute outreach during the Campaign. With visible improvements in the Chemistry Building and numerous faculty receiving grants to conduct research, the Campaign has helped enhance our academic culture.

In addition, programs at the Martin Institute, such as the Catholic-Jewish Dialogue Committee and the W.B. Mason Forum, have made it one of the leading centers for education, research and public service in Southeastern Massachusetts. Speakers ranging from former Governor Weld and Senator John Kerry to author Cornel West have graced the Institute in recent years, creating a dynamic center of public policy debate right on campus.

Lastly, the Campaign provided over $2.5 million for the Annual Fund, which provides much needed unrestricted resources for the College.

As a result of the Campaign’s triumph, Stonehill today stands ready to face the challenges of the 21st century with renewed optimism and hope. The experience of a successful Capital Campaign prompts us to reach for even greater heights in the future. Stonehill is grateful to everyone who participated in this historic undertaking.
Last November, a cross section of Stonehill friends and supporters gathered at the Four Seasons in Boston to celebrate the successful conclusion of Securing the Vision: The Campaign for Stonehill's Future.

Campaign by the Numbers

Did you know...

- Alumni participation averaged 32% during the Campaign.
- The average Alumni Fund gift increased by 22%.
- During the Alumni and Parents Fund Phonathons: Out of 63,901 calls, 25,052 people were reached, and 8,458 specific pledges were fulfilled, totaling $454,109 in fulfilled pledges.
- Alumni volunteers contributed 1,900 hours of service while parent volunteers contributed 240 hours to the phonathons.
- During the Campaign, Stonehill graduated 2,676 alumni.

Grants Update

- Associate Professor of Foreign Languages Antonio Barbagallo received a Stonehill Summer 1997 grant to do research on Cervantes.
- Assistant Dean for Academic Services Richard Grant received a second grant from the Massachusetts Campus Compact to fund the Stonehill North Educational Collaborative. The Collaborative pairs Stonehill students with students at North Junior High School in Brockton for four days a week to teach study skills and to assist with homework assignments, as well as to participate in enrichment activities.
- Associate Professor of Sociology Susan Guarino-Ghezzi will be the principal investigator for the project “Evaluation of the Plymouth County Juvenile Court (Brockton Division) Youth Intervention Project” (YIP) funded by the U.S. Department of Justice. The YIP is a multi-faceted initiative focusing on juvenile crime in the City of Brockton. It is a collaboration among the Brockton Mayor’s Office, Brockton Police Department, Brockton Public Schools, Plymouth County Juvenile Court (Brockton Division), Plymouth County District Attorney and local citizens’ groups and business leaders.
- Assistant Professor of Chemistry Louis Liotta received a $3,500 grant from the DuPont Educational Aid Program for “Support for Undergraduate Summer Research,” which was submitted on Stonehill’s behalf by alumnu Brenda Gelinas ’81.
- Professor of Economics Robert Rosenthal completed a project funded by the North River Collaborative, a regional organization providing education services for special education students. The project entailed a forecast of special education students throughout Massachusetts and the region through 2002, including breakdowns for specific prototypes of special education.

He began work on two U.S. Department of Justice, Office of Community Oriented Policing Services Problem Solving Partnership grants. Rosenthal will measure and assess the impact of crime through property valuation, other factors and various programs designed to reduce the incidence of crime. The total of these grants is approximately $20,000. Rosenthal’s proposal to the Massachusetts Youth Teenage Unemployment Reduction Network and the Massachusetts Office of School-to-Work, to undertake a long term study evaluating the impact of the Federal 1993 School-to-Work Act has been accepted. He has received a commitment of approximately $13,000 for 1998 with intent by the funding agencies to renew the project over a three to four year period.
Building a Library

By Edward Hynes

As you know, the College recently completed its first Capital Campaign. The major portion of the Campaign's financial goal — $11 million out of $20 million — was earmarked for building a new library. After years of planning and fund raising, construction finally began last spring and the building is scheduled to open for September 1998.

The library project goes back to the 1980s when the former library director, Carol Fraser, notified President Fr. Bartley MacPhaidin, C.S.C. and other senior administrators that the Cushing-Martin Library was running out of stack space. In addition, the library suffered from insufficient staff and reader spaces and the difficulty of adapting a 30-year-old building to meet rapidly changing technology requirements. A number of solutions were examined and it was decided to build an entirely new library that would have space for 20 years' growth in the collection, seat 25 percent of our students and provide a modern electronic and data infrastructure to support information technology.

Planning 20 years out in the current environment is challenging indeed. On one hand, cost analyses indicate that it is still cheaper to add stack space rather than to attempt to digitize a collection (although we are approaching the crossover point), and it is also clear that the printed book will remain essential to academic publishing for a number of years. On the other hand, libraries have changed over the last 25 years due to developments in information technology — online databases, computerized catalogs, the PC and the Internet — and this technology will continue to have an enormous influence on how libraries work. The requirement, therefore, is for a building that can accommodate both traditional and cutting edge services in order to provide users with an integrated information resource.

The new library, named in honor of Fr. MacPhaidin, is designed as a learning space and nexus for information in all formats, whether owned locally or accessed via the Internet. The first floor is the research center, with networked research computers, the print and digitized reference materials, recent periodicals, microfilm, multimedia and video materials readily accessible. Reference librarians and other staff will support these resources and assist patrons with their research. In addition, there will be a contemporary electronic classroom where librarians will provide formal instruction in research techniques.

The two upper floors will house the main book and government document collections and provide various types of reader spaces. The latter will include 11 small group study rooms, twice the current number, and assorted seating at tables, carrels and lounge furniture. There will be network and power connections at each seat so patrons with laptop computers will be able to use them anywhere in the building. Finally, the third floor will house a small general-purpose computer cluster for word processing.

Besides its physical presence, the library will also have a significant virtual presence on the campus network. We already make the Encyclopedia Britannica and over 300 online journals available anywhere on campus and this kind of service will continue to develop with locally mounted and remotely accessed resources.

The new library will be a uniquely academic facility that provides a center for the students and faculty as learners and researchers. As with no other building on campus, the library will bring together teaching and learning, tradition and change, and it is a fitting capstone to the College's first 50 years.

Edward Hynes is Director of the College Library.
David Almeida, associate professor of education, spent one hour per day for three weeks in a third grade classroom teaching a unit on the voyage of the Mayflower, using a play from a book he co-authored with Education Instructor Albert Cullum titled America on Tour: Historical Plays for the Classroom.

J. Richard Anderson, associate professor of business administration, published his case titled “Bethlehem Steel in a third grade classroom three weeks in a third grade classroom teaching a unit on the voyage of the Mayflower, spent one hour per day for teaching a unit on the voyage of the Mayflower...”

Antonio Barbagallo, associate professor of foreign languages, read his paper, “Cardenio, Hombre Atipico” at the III Congreso Internacional De La Asociacion De Cervantistas in Menorca, Spain last October.

Tony-Lee Capossela, associate professor of writing, spent five weeks in Russia at the end of the 1997 spring semester teaching business writing, running faculty workshops and giving English tutorials through Stonehill’s faculty exchange program with Yaroslavl State University. She also visited the Language Institute at Yaroslavl, where she discussed second-language pedagogy with instructors and made a video. Her book, The Harcourt Brace Guide to Peer Tutoring, was published in March.

Fr. James Chichetto, C.S.C. ’64, assistant professor of writing, donated his correspondence, papers, reviews, sketches and watercolors for The Connecticut Poetry Review (over 200 items) to Brown University’s John Hay Library of Rare Books and Special Collections. In November, he participated in the Conference of the Association of Literary Criticism and Scholars held in San Francisco. Last summer he also gave three readings in New England and New York from his new manuscript, “Dream of Norumbega,” a 3,000 line poem on angels, ghosts and genocide in North America. More of his work is forthcoming in East and West Literary Journal and Parmassus.

MaryJean Viano Crowe, photography instructor in the Fine Arts Department, had an Internet interview with Speos l’Institut de la Photographie de Paris in conjunction with her solo exhibit, All-Consuming Myths, at Milton Academy in January 1998; exhibited in the Faculty Biennial Exhibit at the Museum of Rhode Island School of Design; and exhibited “White Lies” at Monmouth University, Long Branch, N.J., last fall. Her work appears in Photomontage: A Step-by-Step Guide to Building Images.

The Board of Trustees approved the following faculty promotions at their January meeting:

Promotion to Professor:
Kenneth Branco, Department of Sociology and Criminology
Ralph Bravaco, Department of Mathematics
Robert Carver, Department of Business Administration
Anthony Celano, Department of Philosophy
Katie Conboy, Department of English
Patricia Sankus, Department of Communication and Theatre Arts
John Schatzel, Department of Business Administration
Gregory Shaw, Department of Religious Studies

Promotion to Associate Professor:
David Almeida, Department of Education
Lincoln Craton, Department of Psychology
Maria Curtin, Department of Chemistry
G.William Kennedy, Department of Business Administration
John Lenci, Department of Religious Studies
Edward McCarron, Department of History
Xuejian Yu, Department of Communication and Theatre Arts

Pressures and Institutional Responses” at the Southern International Studies Association in Miami last October. The last paper noted above also will appear as a chapter in The Ethnic Entanglement. Finnegan also served as an evaluator for the U.S. Department of Education Grants to Institutions for internationalizing their programs under Title VI.

Fr. Thomas Gariepy, C.S.C. ’70, associate professor of history and philosophy of science, participated in a Dibner Institute Seminar in the History of Biology at the Marine Biological Laboratory at Woods Hole last summer. In addition to four articles for the American National Biography, he wrote an article on American surgery for the Oxford Companion to United States History.

Susan Guarino-Ghezzi, associate professor of sociology, co-authored the following papers: “Protecting Community: The Public Safety Role in a Restorative Juvenile Justice” in Restoring Juvenile Justice; and “Evaluating Treatment Effects on Juvenile Sex Offenders” in Corrections Management Quarterly, to be published this year.
The Miami Herald published Director of Communications Martin McGovern's op-ed, "Precious Phone Calls to the Old Country."

The Christian Science Monitor published "For '90s Kids, the Boom Box's Blast Has Drowned Out the Written Word," an op-ed by Physics Professor Chet Raymo.

The Chicago Tribune published a piece on affirmative action in higher education titled "Diversity's Value is Diminished When it Discourages Dialogue" by Professor of Philosophy Celia Wolf-Devine.

Assistant Professor of Health Care Administration Warren Dahlin was featured in the Boston Herald and on the Paul Harvey News Broadcast for his work with Peter Wong, who lives with cerebral palsy.

Channel 56 and Media One featured Stonehill students on alternative volunteer spring break trips in March.

Fox 25 News and New England Cable News featured Professor of Political Science Richard Finnegan '64 on the Irish in America on March 17.

The Patriot Ledger and The Enterprise did lengthy features on Stonehill last fall, as the College prepares to celebrate its 50th anniversary.

Assistant Professor of Economics Nancy Hammerle had op-eds published in the The Boston Sunday Globe, "On the Yellow Brick Road to College," and the Providence Journal Bulletin, "An Exclusive Multiculturalism" and "No Cure for the Human Condition."

Associate Professor of Philosophy Richard Capobianco had op-eds published in the The Boston Sunday Globe, "On the Yellow Brick Road to College," and the Providence Journal Bulletin, "An Exclusive Multiculturalism" and "No Cure for the Human Condition."
Joel Ohren, associate professor of psychology, presented a co-authored paper titled “Knowledge Change in the Context of a College Course in Organic Chemistry” at the annual meeting of the New England Psychological Association last October.

Robert Rosenthal, professor of economics, presented a paper at the Third National School-to-Work Conference in Orlando, Fla. in November titled, “School-to-Work and Its Impact on Post-Secondary Career Planning: A Study of High School Seniors in Massachusetts.” He has been named principal evaluator on grants from the U.S. Department of Justice, and the Office of Community Oriented Policing Service (COPS) Problem Solving Partnership. Rosenthal will measure and assess the impact of crime through property valuation as well as other factors and evaluate the impact of various programs designed to reduce the incidence of crime at the local level.

Philosophy instructor Christopher Schiavone recently spoke to the Easton Rotary on “Ethics and the Media.” Having served as a consultant to several media organizations, including NBC in New York and Discovery Communications, Schiavone established an independent research and consulting practice, City Square Associates in Boston.

Gregory Shaw, professor of religious studies, presented a paper in November titled “Eros and Arithmos: Pythagorean Theurgy in Iamblichus and Plotinus” at the annual meeting of the American Academy of Religion in San Francisco, Calif.

Shai Simonson, associate professor of mathematics and computer science, presented “The History of Mathematical Ingenuity” in Atlanta, Ga. in August, sponsored by the Mathematical Association of America, and “The Mathematics of Levi ben Gershom” at the Northeastern Regional Conference of the American Mathematical Society in Montreal in September.

Celia Wolf-Devine, associate professor of philosophy, gave a lecture at Providence College in November titled “Affirmative Action: The Argument from Diversity” and was a panelist at the plenary session of the National Association of Scholars annual meeting in New Orleans, La. in December on “Is Multicultural Diversity Educationally Valuable?”

A New Temple for Corinth: Rhetorical and Archaeological Approaches to Pauline Imagery, authored by Associate Professor of Religious Studies John Lanci, examines the role that St. Paul’s image of the community as a temple plays in his overall rhetorical argument in 1 Corinthians. It challenges the traditional notions that Paul is inviting his correspondents to understand themselves as a new temple replacing the one in Jerusalem. Rather, Paul uses a cultic metaphor that both Gentile and Jew could understand to introduce his central motif of community upbuilding for the sake of the common good. Lanci’s examination of the first century Corinthian archaeology suggests methods to correct and complement previous literary and historical critical analyses of the Pauline corpus. (Published by Peter Lang, New York, N.Y.)

Wadi Dalieh I: The Wadi Dalieh I Seal Impressions, by Assistant Professor of Religious Studies Mary Joan Winn Leith, presents a catalogue and analysis of the legible sealings and two gold seal rings in the Wadi ed-Daliyeh collection of the Rockefeller Museum in Jerusalem. The Wadi ed-Daliyeh seal impressions are clay sealings originally affixed to the Samaria Papyri (legal documents in the Aramaic language drawn up in the city of Samaria and securely dated to the mid-fourth century BCE), explains Leith. The images on these sealings belong to the Greek, Achaemenid Persian, and West Semitic artistic traditions. Because the sealings derive largely from the signet rings and stamps of the wealthy Samaritan men and women mentioned in the papyri, they provide a rare glimpse of the cultural influences to which one area of Palestine was exposed before the coming of Alexander. BOOKSHELF

A Synopsis of Genetics, prepared by Associate Professor of Biology Roger Denome, is intended to act as a bridge between concepts taught in freshman biology and the encyclopedic texts that are available in the field of genetics. Students use Denome’s book to develop a global view of how concepts in genetics are connected, without getting bogged down in detail and example. The brevity of the text allows students to use it as a study guide when preparing for exams, and as a review of genetics for other courses that require relatively sophisticated genetic background. Alumni Weekend

Stonehill welcomed hundreds of alumni back to campus for Alumni Weekend '97, which was held Sept. 19-21. A record 700 young alumni attended the annual Friday night reception in Boston at the Claddagh Restaurant & Bar, which featured music and a lot of reminiscing.

Alumni volunteers were invited to attend the inaugural Alumni Leadership Day program on Saturday morning. The program consisted of a student panel, a discussion on volunteerism at the College, and a state of the College address by Vice President for College Relations Francis X. Dillon '70. All of the participants learned a great deal about the College and the importance of alumni volunteers was reemphasized.

The second annual Alumni Tailgate was also a success. With the addition of children's games, and a visit by Winnie the Pooh, this event strives to make Alumni Weekend fun for the entire family. The Stonehill football team suffered a heartbreakng loss to AIC, but all enjoyed returning to watch the game.

Sunday morning, 50 alumni attended the Decade of the '50s Mass and Brunch. Assistant Professor of History Fr. Richard Gribble, C.S.C. shared anecdotes from Fulfilling a Dream: Stonehill College 1948 to 1998. The women's soccer alumni game was held on Oct. 12 and the alumni cross-country meet took place on Oct. 22. Following the men's basketball game against New Hampshire College on Dec. 20, alumni returned to the court to compete. The women followed suit with an alumni game prior to the team's contest against St. Michael's on Jan. 24. The alumni games provide former athletes a chance to reunite with teammates and coaches and also to get updates on the current Stonehill teams.

Annual Alumni Golf Tournament

The 13th annual tournament was held at Easton Country Club on Sept. 27 and was sold-out for the first time in the event's history. Over $2,000 was raised for the Alumni Scholarship Fund through hole sponsorships and a raffle. Patrick O'Shea '83, Michael Robb '83, Kevin Noonan '83, and Mark Noonan comprised the winning foursome with the lowest score in the scramble tournament. To end the day, all golfers enjoyed a family-style dinner in the clubhouse.

Alumni Athletic Events

Former athletes are invited back to campus during the year for special alumni games. The men's soccer alumni game was held on Oct. 12 and the alumni cross-country meet took place on Oct. 19. Following the men's basketball game against New Hampshire College on Dec. 20, alumni returned to the court to compete. The women followed suit with an alumni game prior to the team's contest against St. Michael's on Jan. 24. The alumni games provide former athletes a chance to reunite with teammates and coaches and also to get updates on the current Stonehill teams.

Student Alumni Association

The Student Alumni Association was busy this fall – offering three programs and volunteering at many College and alumni events. Alumni returning to campus for Alumni Weekend were greeted with welcome signs and banners entered in this year's annual Banner Contest.
Fifteen alumni met with students to discuss career experiences and opportunities during "Who's Coming to Dinner?" which took place Oct. 28-30. Kelly Grant '95, Garth McKinney '94 and Erica Hart '97 shared their postgraduate experiences with members of the Class of '98 at the New Grad Panel, held during the Senior Transitions Conference on Nov. 11. The organization has scheduled five Alumni Career Panel Nights for the spring semester. Many thanks to the countless alumni who have participated in the SAA's programs and assisted Stonehill students with career decisions.

Cape Cod Catholic College Luncheon

Stonehill alumni on the Cape joined alumni from Holy Cross, Regis College and Emmanuel College on Oct. 17 for a luncheon at the Ballymeade Country Club in North Falmouth. Sr. Sheila Megley, RSM, the new president of Regis College, was the featured speaker.

Another Cape Cod luncheon will be held in the Fall of 1999.

Downtown Club Reception

Alumni working in Boston accounting firms were invited to a reception at the Downtown Club on Nov. 5. Over 30 alumni attended the event and heard an update on the Capital Campaign.

Professor of Business Administration John Shatzel gave a presentation about the new use of technology in the accounting program. He encouraged all to visit the award winning accounting website at http://www.stonehill.edu/academics/accounting.

1997 Alumni Service Award

The recipients of the 1997 Alumni Service Award have been long-time College volunteers who have supported the advancement of the Alumni Association in countless ways.

Surrounded by family and friends, including many local alumni volunteers, Fr. James Chichetto, C.S.C. '64 received his award at the Nov. 16 Volunteer Appreciation Dinner. During his 11-year tenure on the Alumni Council, Fr. Chichetto has dedicated his time to many projects and committees. A three-year member of the Auction Committee, Fr. Chichetto was selected by his peers as co-chairperson for the 1997 Auction. He also has served on the Academic, Scholarship, Special Projects and Executive Committees. Since 1974, Fr. Chichetto has served Stonehill as an assistant professor of writing. Whether he is leading his peers to another successful auction or tutoring his students, Fr. Chichetto constantly serves the Stonehill community.

Rarely can a Stonehill event occur in Washington D.C. without the attendance (and probably the assistance) of Steve '55 and Mary (Filippetti) '55 Markey. Standing (L-R): Karla Morast '01, John Markey '58, Freeman Winslow '88, Lisa (Markey) Zolga '81, Bill Zolga '80, Lou Filippetti '61, and Kerry Morast '98.
Alumni Council Meeting

On Oct. 18, the Alumni Council welcomed Dean of Admissions and Enrollment Brian Murphy '68 to its fall meeting. Murphy discussed trends in higher education and how Stonehill is growing with these changes. Jocelyn King, associate director of development, reported on the success of the 1997 Annual Fund and solicited suggestions for the 1998 drive. Each of the subcommittee chairs reported on the work of the committees and Vice President for College Relations Francis X. Dillon '70 reported on the last stages of the Capital Campaign. Members continued to discuss all issues over lunch, where they were joined by this year's recipients of the Alumni Council Scholarships.

Senior Transitions Conference

Alumni, faculty and administrators joined together for the 2nd Annual Senior Transitions Conference on Nov. 11. The day-long event featured keynote speakers, breakout presentations, drop-in centers and display counters. Members of the Class of 1998 were invited to benefit from the experience of Stonehill graduates and staff. The Honorable Catherine Sabaitis '75 began the day with a presentation covering the top 10 things you need to know to survive life after graduation. A panel of young alumni answered student questions and shared experiences during the New Grad Panel. Army Lt. Col. Richard Lally '79 ended the day by discussing the value of the Stonehill experience and how it has helped him succeed. Individual seminars covered such topics as apartment leasing, car buying, resume writing and interview skills. Brian Hoffman '77 served as conference moderator.

Satellite Receptions

The Nov. 15 Stonehill-Bentley football game was broadcast live on NESN and alumni across the country tuned in for the exciting match-up. Alumni and parents also were invited to events held in Washington D.C., Hartford, Conn., New York, N.Y. and Boston.

Alumni Mass of Thanksgiving

Alumni joined the Stonehill community in the Chapel of Mary for the annual Alumni Mass of Thanksgiving. More than 1,200 intention cards were received by Alumni Minister Fr. Jack McCarthy, C.S.C., who presided at Mass.

Auction '97

The 4th Annual Alumni Auction was held on Nov. 1 in the Martin Institute. The event featured a wide variety of items (antiques to jewelry, artwork to beanie babies) and raised over $28,000 for the Fr. Bartley MacPhailidín, C.S.C. Library. The 200 guests enjoyed the silent auction before sitting down to dinner. Guest MC's Dick Flavin '58 and Lou Gorman '53 assisted the auctioneer during the live bidding. Planning for Auction '98 (Nov. 7 – mark your calendars!) has begun. Anyone interested in joining the committee should contact the Alumni Office.

Stonehill College presents

REUNION '98

OPENING:

May 29 to May 31 on campus

Make plans now to join your classmates for this very special weekend. Watch your mail for registration details!

Contributions from the intentions totaled over $1,400 and were added to the Colleen Coyle-Green '73 Memorial Scholarship Fund. An Anniversary Mass for Colleen is offered every Oct. 4 on campus by her friends and family.

Young Alumni Gift Wrapping Party

Once again, over 100 gifts were collected, wrapped and donated to My Brother's Keeper to help needy families at Christmas. Several recent graduates and their families attended the Dec. 4 event in Donahue Hall.

Theater Events

Over 40 Stonehill alumni attended the Jan. 22 performance of “Showboat” at the Bushnell Theater in Hartford, Conn. and 150 alumni headed to the Colonial Theatre in Boston for the Jan. 30 performance of the Broadway-smash, “Chicago.”

Young Alumni Mardi Gras Party

Over 65 Boston-area young alumni headed to the “Big Easy” on Feb. 18 for a reception with 500 recent graduates from Providence College, Boston College, Holy Cross and Regis College. Live music, cajun food and authentic Mardi Gras beads were highlights of the night.
Award Winning

Student Group

Forms Bridge

between Students and Alumni

Now in its seventh year, the Student Alumni Association (SAA) at Stonehill plays a vital role in the workings of the Alumni Office and the College Relations Division, while establishing itself as one of the most prominent student alumni organizations in the region.

When established in 1991 by Anne Pollick '88, then assistant director of alumni affairs, and Stephen Kimball '93, the SAA looked to form a bridge between students and alumni. The group's mission is threefold. First, members become acquainted with the programs and activities of the Office of Alumni Affairs and the Alumni Association, and, in turn, become active alumni volunteers for the College after graduation. Second, the organization reconnects alumni to the campus and links them to the student population. Finally, the members volunteer as student ambassadors at alumni programs and events, allowing staff to enhance and add programs.

If you have attended your Reunion or a recent Alumni Weekend, you have witnessed how important these students have become to many alumni programs. Additionally, the group has sponsored countless events, bringing alumni and students together. The New Grad Panel has annually enlightened upper-class students, as the panelists reflect on what they did right (and wrong) in making the transition from student to alum. Career Panel Nights allow alumni from specific fields to discuss their career paths with interested students. In a more casual setting, "Who's Coming to Dinner?" lets alumni meet one-to-one (or in small groups) with students looking to get tips on specific employment areas.

The SAA has also made a name for itself among its peers at other New England institutions. In April of 1996, Stonehill hosted the District Conference. This marked the first time in Stonehill history that a student group sponsored an on-campus, multi-day conference. The hard work of all of the members was rewarded when Stonehill's SAA received the 1996 Outstanding Organization Award for the New England region. Last spring, the group was awarded the Outstanding Program Award for its traditions booklet, Shovels, Digging up the Past. (This collection of anecdotes and old traditions will be released during the College's 50th Anniversary Celebration.)

Many former SAA members are active alumni volunteers. In fact, seven have served on the Alumni Council and 12 are on the Reunion '98 Committee for the Class of 1993. A total of 30 (44.7 percent) former SAA members are current alumni volunteers and over 63 percent of former members contributed to the 1997 Annual Fund (as compared to less than 25 percent for their respective classes).

Clearly this organization has succeeded in reaching its goals. Alumni Council President Chuck Bartolini '81 said, "The Alumni Association certainly benefits from the SAA. We are very lucky to have the students on-hand to assist throughout the year."

Current members recognize the impact of the founding SAA members. They now see former SAA members taking leadership roles within the Alumni Association and hope to follow in their footsteps. President Katie Ramos '98 reminds the group, "We are only building upon what the other members started. It is great to see the former members come back as alumni and participate in our programs."

After his graduation last May, Joseph Pannozzo '97 committed to one year of service in the Edmundite Missions Corps, which has served the African American community for 60 years in the Deep South. He and six other volunteers work at the Selma Youth Development Center, serving approximately 150 underprivileged youth. Below he shares some thoughts on his volunteer service and how it has strengthened his faith in God:

We were barely off the plane last August when a most impressive experience took effect. Vredefburg, Alabama, just 30 miles south of Selma, maintains one of the Edmundites' many missions. It is a frightening place, with its rural poverty emulating that of a third-world country, and it was here where we encountered one unforgettable religious sister. This strong, aged woman lives in a trailer, and ministers to the underprivileged of Vredefburg through her GED (General Education Degree) class.

On our visit, we saw the modest classroom and its chairs, tables, and even computers, though the contents of the facility did not leave an impression. As the sister spoke of her difficult ministry, we asked, "Sister, how do you remain dedicated and positive in your work?" I continue to seek refuge and comfort in her words of response as I face my own obstacles in Selma. As if it were common knowledge or plastered on the walls, she said, "It's all God's work down here. I am only His agent of peace while attempting to fulfill my calling." So simple these words are in context, yet so setting and profound they have been for my life in Selma.

In a nutshell, this experience encompasses many challenges, fears, and unsettling questions. I too work with young adults in a GED setting. The road our students travel each day is no easier than that of the sister's students. Some of my students dropped out or were kicked out of school as early as the seventh grade, and several read at the third or fourth grade level.

Guns, drugs and unwanted pregnancies pervade their worlds, and attempting to educate and prepare them for this beacon of hope, the GED, requires a person's ultimate courage, strength, patience, and most importantly, faith in God. For when progress emulates that of a snail's pace, and a student challenges all the virtues with which God has provided us, I call to mind that religious sister's words of faith: "It's God's work." Instantly, I feel relieved and peaceful again as I take refuge in my faith in God. Yes, these are His children, and more cosmically, every minute bit of volunteer service to the world helps someone discover themselves and better this planet. As long as we continue to listen to His word and live by our faith in it, love will continue to bring peace to a society plagued with pain.

Amy Zopecki '97 is doing mission work through the Congregation of Holy Cross in California. Below, she shares the journey that led her to choose this fulfilling post-graduation experience:

I live with six other college graduates in a small two-bedroom apartment. All of us are away from family and friends, and each of us is doing missionary work for the year. Each person in the house has a different job: AIDS supporter, AIDS educator, tutor, church outreach, and teacher. I work as a case manager for the homeless at Traveler’s Aid Society. This work, and I don’t like to call it work, is in my eyes the furthest thing an average college student does after graduation. I remember long days of classes, nights of philosophical debating about life, falling in love, learning, playing and finding God while at Stonehill, but I never imagined this is where I’d end up after graduation.

Throughout my four years at Stonehill I experienced several unforgettable opportunities. My junior year I did an internship abroad at a therapeutic community for heroin and cocaine addicts. I participated in two life-changing alternative spring breaks, one to Bedford-Stuyvesant in Brooklyn, N.Y. and the other in a community in Chacraseca, Nicaragua, Stonehill also provided me with the opportunity to have an internship at the Massachusetts State Department of Public Health my senior year. Truly it is my family and the gracious, humble and beautiful people I crossed paths with at Stonehill that has led me to this year of service.

Daily, I counsel those who live on the streets. They are desperate, addicted, lost, mentally and/or physically disabled, angry and searching for a God. I know there is a lack of people who want to reach out to these people. One day, hours before I had to make a definite decision whether or not to do this year of volunteer work, my best friend told me a story about giving someone a second chance. It was more of a revelation to me that everyone: homeless, affluent, educated, uneducated, grieving, widowed, sick or healthy, everyone deserves a second chance. I sometimes grow frustrated throughout my days to see God in all those I serve, but I remind myself that there is a reason for everything and God works in so many beautiful and mysterious ways.

After this year in California, I will be making my way back east to pursue a career in public health. I will continue to travel, play, debate, and serve the God that has given me this abundantly fruitful existence. Thank you Stonehill, especially to all of you who have been so loving and giving of your friendship and irreverent knowledge.

Call for Nominations
The Fr. Basil Moreau, C.S.C. Medallion

As part of Stonehill’s 50th Anniversary celebration, 50 individuals who have played an important role in the development of the College will be honored with a specially cast Fr. Basil Moreau, C.S.C. Medallion. The selection committee is now soliciting nominations from all College constituencies for recipients of this award, named in honor of the Congregation of Holy Cross founder.

Please consider nominating one or more individuals - living or deceased - who represent Stonehill’s vision of “Light and Hope.” The committee intends to select recipients from each decade of College history. We seek nominations for:

- Individuals central to the founding or historical development of the College
- Individuals who have made lasting impressions on students
- Individuals who have brought external recognition to the College
- Individuals who have contributed significantly (not necessarily financially) to Stonehill’s mission
- Other individuals whose low profiles may belie the importance of their work

As we mark this important moment in Stonehill’s history, those individuals who are honored with the medallion will represent many others who have helped to develop and fulfill the original vision of the Congregation of Holy Cross.

Please submit nominations (complete with nomination form) to:

Boredom

By Fr. Robert J. Kruse, C.S.C. '55

The blind beggar in today's Gospel is a model for each one of us. Our own vision is often limited. We need to pray for new eyes and a new heart. We need to ask the Lord to see. I think what prevents our seeing is our tendency to fall into habits and into patterns that limit our vision. Life becomes repetitious and monotonous. We fail to see our lives with fresh eyes.

Last summer I read The Silent Angel, written by Heinrich Boll. It is the story of a soldier's return to the bombed out city of Cologne after the Second World War. Toward the end of the story, the soldier decides to go to confession. The exchange between him and the priest goes like this:

"I don't know when I last confessed for the most part," he said, "I've been bored. I neither prayed to strange gods nor betrayed my wife while she lived..."

"You had a wife?"

"Yes...bored," he said, "bored beyond words...no sacraments-no Masses-the last Mass was a year ago. Yes-one year ago. I've sinned against the Sixth Commandment a few times-I've stolen..."

"No such thing as the same thing, I wondered. Of course, for Monet there was no such thing as the same thing. The great Cathedral constantly changed with every change in the time of day, with every change of the season of the year, much as the haystacks, and poplars, and water-lilies which he painted repeatedly, repeatedly changed."

The priest cleared his throat. "Boredom," he said, "doesn't come from God. Always remember that. It may well have some good purpose, just as evil may, even must, serve a good purpose, in some mysterious way, you see. But boredom certainly doesn't come directly from God. Think about that. Pray when you're bored, and if at first you feel even more bored, keep praying anyway. Do you hear? At some point it will work. Just keep on praying and get married."

What I found unexpected about this scene were the first words of confession: "For the most part I've been bored." And again: "Yes...bored...bored beyond words."

I think there's something profound in confessing boredom as one's main sin. Isn't it equivalent to saying that I am blind, that I do not see with the eyes of faith? In the soldier's case of course, the war he had lived through would make his vision all the more "through a glass darkly."

The priest's counsel is wise. Boredom is not from God. "Pray when you're bored, and if at first you feel even more bored, keep praying anyway...At some point it will work."

I think we get bored because so much of what we do involves repetition. I remember being very surprised when I visited the Impressionist Gallery in Paris many years ago and saw painting after painting of the façade of Rouen Cathedral by Claude Monet. Why does he keep painting the same thing, I wondered. Of course, for Monet there was no such thing as the same thing. The great Cathedral constantly changed with every change in the time of day, with every change of the season of the year, much as the haystacks, and poplars, and water-lilies which he painted repeatedly, repeatedly changed.

It is something like that which T.S. Eliot must have had in mind when he wrote: "There is...at best only a limited value in the knowledge derived from experience. The knowledge imposes a pattern, and falsifies. For the pattern is new in every moment. And every moment is a new and shocking valuation of all we have been." ("East Coker"")

That is what we pray God to see. That every moment holds new, maybe shocking possibilities. But the newness does not arise so much from without as it does from within us. God is making all things new...including us. We pray not to be tricked by old patterns and old habits into thinking nothing new is happening. With the eyes of faith even the routine events of each day can become revelations.

What is why Eliot ends the same quartet: "We must be still and still moving, into another intensity for a further union, a deeper communion...In my end is my beginning." That intensity, that deeper communion is not a matter of novelty. Rather it is a matter of seeing in a new way what we have always seen. That means seeing it as God sees it. Much as God saw each thing He created and saw that it was good.

In one of his short stories, John Updike wrote: "If all is not well with his world, the rooster never admits it. Every morning...he flaps up on his roof...and gives a crow as if to hoist with his own pure lungs that sleepy fat sun to the zenith of the sky. He never moderates his joy, though I am gradually growing deaf to it. That must be the difference between soulless creatures and human beings: creatures find every dawn as remarkable as all the ones previous, whereas the soul grows calluses."

When the young soldier confessed to boredom, he was confessing that his soul had grown callouses. Today as the Gospel records the restoration of sight to a blind man, we pray to see with fresh eyes the events and people of every day. We pray not to lose the gift of wonder.

Updike speculated that soulless creatures, like the rooster, find every dawn remarkable while human beings grow callused. As a kind of counterpoint to that view, and by way of conclusion, here is a brief poem from the Nez Percé native Americans of Idaho and Oregon.

"I wonder if everyone is up.
It is morning.
We are alive, so thanks be.
Rise up! Look about!
Go see the horses!"

New Book Shares Stonehill's History

In celebration of the College’s Golden Anniversary, Fulfilling a Dream: Stonehill College 1948 to 1998, was recently published. The book is a narrative history of Stonehill told within the context of American Catholic higher education in the post World War II era. Written by Fr. Richard Gribble, C.S.C., the text captures the flavor of the College’s challenges, setbacks and triumphs in its first 50 years.

Published by Stonehill College Press, Fulfilling a Dream: Stonehill College 1948 to 1998, which is enhanced by many fine photographs, is priced at $25. Copies will soon be available at the campus bookstore or by calling (508) 565-1344.
